San Pedro de Atacama in the 1990s

In the 1990s, San Pedro de Atacama was a very small village in the north of Chile. There was one small hostel near the main plaza, but there weren't any hotels. There was a local market where people sold fruit, bread, and handicrafts. There weren't many restaurants, only two small cafés near the plaza.

There wasn't a bus station. Most visitors arrived by car. There was a beautiful plaza with green trees, benches, and a small church. There were some bike rental shops for tourists who wanted to visit the desert and the salt flats.

There weren't organized tours, so people needed to ask local families for advice.

San Pedro was very different from the busy tourist destination it is today!
