Have you ever tried windsurfing? Windsurfing is a cross between sailing and surfing; there's a board you stand on, and a sail that catches the wind and pushes you forward. Sounds challenging? Well, it is. But that's what makes it so fun.

No one knows exactly how windsurfing began - some say the Polynesians invented it hundreds of years ago - but the sport of windsurfing really got its start in the 1970s. It became extremely popular by the 1980s, especially in Europe.

Some people have even turned windsurfing into a career. They make thousands of dollars by winning windsurfing competitions and by signing advertising deals with big companies. These serious windsurfers are amazing to watch as they go up the biggest waves, fly up in the air, and land perfectly on the surface of the water.

Before it became so popular and competitive, windsurfing actually used to be a family sport - one that people did with their relatives on a lake during the weekend. You'll still find people enjoying windsurfing as a hobby today. They'll be at beaches and lakes, just relaxing and having fun on their windsurfing boards.

If you like water sports, then you should definitely try windsurfing. The hardest part is learning how to balance without falling over, but once you get a feel for it, it's really fun. In no time at all, you'll be sailing quickly across the water in any direction you want to go - or at the very least, in whatever direction the wind takes you!

Bringing Back The Spacesuit

In 2015, the Smithsonian, the largest museum and research group in the United States, started an important fundraising campaign. Their cause? To preserve Neil Armstrong's nearly 50-year-old spacesuit.

The astronaut's spacesuit was designed especially for walking on the moon. It allowed Armstrong to take photos from the moon's surface and collect rock samples for scientists to study back on Earth. The spacesuit did its job well, and when Armstrong returned, the suit was donated to the Smithsonian to be put on display for all to see. However, as time went by, the spacesuit's quality started to deteriorate. Museum experts knew that without proper care, the suit would soon be in danger of falling apart.

Therefore, in preparation for the moon landing's fiftieth anniversary, the Smithsonian set a goal to raise $500,000 US dollars - the cost of building a display case that could store the spacesuit safely and preserve its quality. Thousands of people donated to the cause, and after only five days, the museum had the money it needed. The case was revealed on July 20th, 2019. It is both temperature- and moisture-controlled, to prevent the suit from getting too hot or cold, or too wet or dry. It even has a way to absorb gases the suit may give off.

Ellen Stofan, director of the National Air and Space Museum, was thankful for all the people who donated money towards preserving the spacesuit. She stated, "Just as it took thousands of men and women to accomplish this mission 50 years ago, we're so proud that thousands of people played a part in getting the spacesuit back on display for the anniversary." Thanks to the efforts of the museum and the people who donated to the cause, the public can continue to enjoy Neil Armstrong's space suit - with moon dust still on it - for many more years to come.
