Identity and the ways we define it are constantly shaped by history. Socio-cultural exchanges in the region have helped establish a sense of a Southeast Asian identity.

In shaping ASEAN Identity, arts and culture have a significant role to play. Artistic and cultural exchanges between Southeast Asian nations expose people to different worldviews and ways of life. They allow ASEAN people to become aware of cultural similarities as well as differences. Discussions alone cannot promote cultural understanding. What we need is to continuously take part in artistic and cultural activities and exchanges to become appreciative of each other's society and culture. The art community has been leading such exchanges for many decades. In visual arts, the countless festivals, biennales, and other collaborative activities have brought together artists from different parts of Southeast Asian countries. These efforts have taken artistic practices into a whole new level and resulted in an array of artistic works that stretches from one corner of Southeast Asia to the other. Governments should play a facilitating role in this bottom-up process of regional identity-making.

We begin with an awareness that each culture has been influenced by and have similarities with other cultures. Hybridisation, resulting from borrowing and adoption of cultural elements of other societies, is a historical fact. Having said these, ASEAN Member States are still very much culturally diverse. We should pay serious attention to each other's cultural differences and specific cultural contexts to preserve national identities while building regional harmony. We believe that such cultural diversity is not an obstacle to development. In fact, we believe that cultural diversity is the foundation of sustainable development. ASEAN Member States' distinct cultural practices allow each state to respond to complex sustainable development challenges such as climate change, migration, rapid population growth, food insecurity, land degradation, war and conflict in different ways. But our efforts can be complementary and can have spaces for collaboration. Our diverse cultural expressions can be channelled to create cultural and creative industries. Everywhere in the world today, cultural economy is on the rise. We need to invest in culture not only to improve people's economic welfare, but also to create a more tolerant and diverse society.

To foster ASEAN identity, we need to make an effort to strengthen our regional cultural ecosystem. Our regional identity depends on the preservation of the cultural identities of each ASEAN Member state. Hence, each state must work to nurture its unique cultural expressions while collaborating with other nations to expand cultural exchanges and link our cultural and creative industries.
