2. Reading for Information & Argument

The idea of world or global citizenship is an important one. At a time when so many of our most urgent challenges take a global form, it makes sense that the notion of citizenship should expand beyond narrow national interests and that people across the world should experience a sense of responsibility to those outside their local or regional communities. One of the most important uses of this idea currently is Global Citizen, an advocacy website and annual music festival. On September 26, Manhattan's Central Park will be packed with tens of thousands of enthusiastic young people, eager to see artists such as Beyoncé, and just as keen to express empathy for the world's poor.

Sadly, the admirable social consciousness Global Citizen taps into looks like it is going to waste. The campaign offers a hopelessly depoliticized picture of poverty--- which is always a political problem above all---and fails to make serious demands of key institutions. From perspectives of the world's poor, the Global Citizen Festival looks less like a strategic intervention on their behalf and more like a demonstration of young Americans' support for a doomed agenda for global "development," one that serves the interests of the rich and powerful first and foremost. As young people concerned about these issues, we urge Global Citizen to do better.

Global Citizen does do important work in raising awareness of poverty and mobilizing an enormous amount of people, but because of its partnerships, sponsors, and associations---the UN, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, Citibank, Google, Unilever---and the special interests inherent in those associations, Global Citizen risks providing cover for politicians and companies rather than holding them accountable to young people who care about poverty.
