Cultural Anthropology

Cultural anthropology of the 20th century was greatly influenced by the so-called culture history school, founded by Franz Boas, a German-born American. He supported the idea that researchers should collect evidence of the diversity of human social structures and behavior by observing people in their natural environs. In his view, the task of the anthropologist was to go out into the field to observe and gather facts and artifacts, record social and cultural processes, and use this data as the basis of a theoretical description. This emphasis on fieldwork and firsthand observation influenced a whole generation of sociologists and cultural anthropologists.
