One thing's for sure – whichever route you take across the USA won't be a quick journey. Distances range between 3,800 and 5,600 kilometres, so even if you drove eight hours a day, it would still take six days or more to travel from coast to coast. Up to 20 people every summer make this journey without a car and attempt to run all the way. The fastest time so far is just under 43 days, but this huge physical and mental challenge can take some people several months to complete.

The history of crossing the USA on foot goes back to 1909, when Edward Payson Weston walked from coast to coast. He left New York City on his 70th birthday and reached San Francisco after 104 days' walking – just missing his goal of 100 days. Distance walking, or pedestrianism, was such a popular sport in those days that crowds would gather to cheer Weston on and updates on his progress appeared in The New York Times. By the time Weston completed his trans-continental walk, he had become a national sporting celebrity.

Running across the USA didn't start until the 1970s, when running became a big fitness craze. The runners who took on the challenge that decade became increasingly competitive and the record was set and broken four times. American runner Pete Kostelnick ran from San Francisco to New York City in 2016 and set the current record, running a daily average of 115 kilometres. Who knows when that will be broken?
