A GOOD JOB

In the past when married couples had problems they usually split up or continued to live together in an unhappy relationship. These days couples, married or not, can get advice on their problems from many sources. A lot of them come to me.

I'm a counsellor and I'm trained to listen to couples with problems. Then I try to advise them on the best way forward. One of my main tasks is to get people to talk to each other and to me. Often a relationship has problems because people keep all their feelings inside. If we talk about things, we can often find an answer. It's also important to realise that we're not all perfect. We all make mistakes. But we need to say sorry and talk about how we can prevent these mistakes from happening again. This can make a relationship stronger.

I don't always succeed in helping people to stay together. Sometimes it's better for the couple to split up and start new lives apart. But it helps everyone if the break-up can be friendly, especially for any children involved.

I love my job. I meet all sorts of people and it's generally very rewarding.

7. Are the sentences true or false?

1. The writer advises single people as well as couples.
2. To become a counsellor you don't need any training.
3. A counsellor needs to be a good listener.
4. Problems usually destroy a marriage.
5. Parents who split up should stay friends for their children.
