The social media effect

Have you ever watched a travel video on TikTok, or an Instagram reel, and thought 'I must go there!?' If the answer is yes, you are not alone. According to a recent study, more than 80% of people, and 90% of Generation Z, have researched a destination after coming across it in an online post. But can social media influence us too much? And is there a danger that the 'picture perfect' holiday we see online may not be perfect at all?

For years, people have been posting videos of popular tourist destinations to keep memories and to connect with family and friends. Travel agents know this and have started advertising holidays in the same way. However, it's social media influencers who have probably had the biggest effect on the destinations people visit.

Of course, there are disadvantages to the way social media affects our choices. People follow the trend of posting videos which suggest their holidays are perfect, by filming deserted beaches and avoiding piles of rubbish or crowds of people. More seriously, when posts go viral, they make a previously unknown place famous. When an area is not prepared for tourism, the result of thousands of visitors can be damaging for both the community and the environment.

Luckily, people have realised that what they see on social media is not always true. As a result, many influencers have begun to create posts which give a more realistic view of other countries and cultures. This helps people to research places properly. It means they can travel virtually to remote areas and learn about different cultures and the local wildlife. They can understand sustainability and eco-tourism, make sensible choices and perhaps in the future visit these places themselves.

There is no doubt that social media has changed the way we see travel and that this can have both good and bad results. So, if we understand the issues and take care to avoid them, social media is a fantastic way to help us decide where to go.
