The old apartment building had many stories, and every (1) _____ seemed to have one to tell. To make life more organized, a small (2) _____ met every month in the lobby to discuss problems like noisy neighbors, broken lights, or lost packages.

There was a (3) _____ of people living there - students, families, and retirees - which made the place lively but sometimes confusing. Some joked that the building was like a (4) _____, with long hallways and turning corners that could easily make newcomers feel lost.

Mrs. Larkin, the oldest tenant, often said the building was both a (5) _____ and a (6) _____. It was old and needed repairs, but it also had friendly people and a warm atmosphere.

One week, strange things began happening. Mailboxes were opened, plants were moved, and someone kept switching the elevator buttons. The committee suspected it was done (7) _____, not by accident. So they decided to watch the hallways more carefully.

At the next meeting, they shared their notes. It turned out several neighbors had been observing the same odd behavior (8) _____, without realizing others had noticed it too. Working together, they finally discovered the culprit - a curious child who simply liked pressing buttons and exploring.

After a gentle talk, peace returned, and everyone remembered why living in the old building felt, more often than not, like a true blessing.
