Next, I walked to the Fiction Section. I spent about half an hour browsing the aisles, looking for a good mystery or a classic piece of literature. I picked up a few titles, including an Agatha Christie novel and a collection of short stories by Ernest Hemingway, but neither one really caught my attention at that moment.

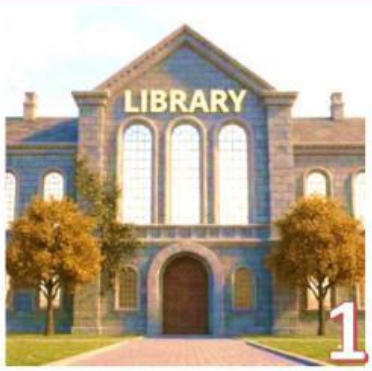

Finally, I started to feel a bit hungry. I managed to find a great new one to read. Then go to the main circulation desk to borrow some books. As I was leaving, I stopped by the Kids' Section to admire the colorful decorations and children excitedly choosing their books.

I arrived at the library around 04.00 PM. The first thing I did was go to the main circulation desk to return the novel I had borrowed previously. The librarian, a friendly older woman with glasses, smiled and quickly processed the return.

Overall, my trip to the City Library was relaxing and productive. The peace and quiet of the library was exactly what I needed after a busy week. I definitely plan to go back again soon.

Next, I moved to the Non-Fiction Section, specifically the history and biography areas. This is where I found what I was looking for: a fascinating book about the history of ancient civilizations. I took the book and found a comfortable armchair near a large window. I spent the next two hours completely lost in the story of pharaohs and pyramids.

Last Saturday, I decided to spend my afternoon at the City Library. It had been a few months since my last visit, and I was looking forward to the quiet atmosphere and the smell of old paper. The weather was perfect—slightly cloudy but warm—making it an ideal day for some indoor reading.
