SECTION A: Reading Comprehension.

Working for ages

I met an extraordinary taxi driver the other day. Mike Davies, who took me to work last week, said he enjoyed his job. After many decades of taking London taxis, I think it's the first time I've met a taxi driver who confessed that his work was fun.

Sometimes, taxi drivers say that they enjoyed their job some time ago – when the traffic wasn't so bad and drivers were more courteous. Other times, they admit that it's possible for a taxi driver to make a lot of money – if you work long hours. But usually they say that working as a taxi driver is really hard.

Mike Davies said he was new to the job. He said he loved driving around London and finding alternate routes, and he also liked talking to his passengers. I tried to depress him a bit. I said that the traffic was getting worse, people ruder, and that in a few years, he would probably be tired of doing that job. 'I hope not,' he said happily – and he did not accept a tip!

I also hope that, but I feel that very few people enjoy doing the same job indefinitely. The telephone engineer who came to install my new telephone lines last week clearly wasn't having any fun. And the painter who had to paint my study three days ago, did not enjoy his job: he left my house and did not paint the door! I imagine both men have done the same job for too long.
