The British electoral system

1 e

The British parliament is said to be the 'Mother of Parliaments' because it has been a model for many modern parliamentary systems around the world. Although some form of parliament has existed in the UK since the thirteenth century, its modern form didn't appear until the beginning of the eighteenth century. This means that while Britain may be the 'Mother of Parliaments', it cannot claim to have the oldest. The oldest parliament is Iceland's, known as 'The Althing', which dates back to the tenth century.

The UK parliament is made up of two 'houses'. The House of Commons consists of elected Members of Parliament (MPs), while the House of Lords is represented by unelected members who have either inherited their titles or been nominated by the government. Historically, the House of Lords was more powerful, but over the centuries, some of that power has been handed to the Commons, whose members debate issues and propose new laws. The government tends to be made up of members of the Commons and this is where the government has to respond to the elected representatives.

There are 650 MPs in total and they are chosen to represent different areas of the country, known as constituencies. Anyone can stand for election, but most MPs belong to the two biggest political parties, the Labour Party and the Conservative Party. These parties are well established in British politics, but some smaller parties, such as the Liberal Democrats and the Green Party, are now also influential. Each party has a manifesto, or list of promises of what they will do if they get elected. Voters therefore vote to elect a person (the MP) and the policies they represent in their manifesto. The political party with the most MPs across the country normally forms the government.

As in many other countries, the main parties are not as popular as they once were. In recent years, smaller parties have appeared and taken votes, reducing the power of the main parties. Given this situation, the government has two options. It can either run a minority government, with little chance of fulfilling its promises, or it can form a coalition. In this case, they have to compromise on their policies and work with other coalition parties. It is argued that this is a positive change as it reflects a more collaborative way of doing things. However, it also means governments are less stable and can result in more frequent elections.

Key elements in the voting process have remained unchanged in recent years. Only adults over the age of 18 are allowed to vote in elections and voters usually go to a polling station to vote for their MP. What has changed is the way the media cover elections. During an election campaign, there is 24-hour news coverage and political parties send targeted messages via social media. Parties are constantly trying to guess what voters want and change these messages daily. As a result, people often have doubts about the best way to cast their vote. Voter turnout has also varied a lot over the years, with between 60 and 80 percent of people voting. Turnout has been particularly low since the beginning of this century, although it has increased slightly in recent years.

People have argued for a change to the electoral system because they believe the current one gives an unfair advantage to the bigger parties. For example, some have proposed an alternative system called proportional representation, which means that the number, or proportion, of MPs reflects the number of votes for each party. However, while this would give smaller parties a chance to participate in government, it could also bring more instability and more frequent elections.
