Shyness can be your way to success

Studies suggest introverts and the socially timid may make better bosses, learn faster, and even be more emotionally mature than their extroverted counterparts.

Shy people are misinterpreted. People often think they are socially uncomfortable, afraid of interaction, bad at conversation, and that they don't have interpersonal skills. It's important to mark the difference between "shyness," "introversion," and "social phobias." A mix of biological, social, and psychological factors often contribute to shyness, especially before puberty.

Shy people may avoid social settings because they feel anxious. Introverts are a little different. They avoid social settings not because of fear, but because they prefer to be alone. Social phobias, on the other hand, are psychiatric disorders with many of the same problems exacerbated to extremes, such as a fear of using public restrooms or eating in front of other people.

But while there are some benefits to being shy, there's some bad news, too. One study showed shy people had trouble reading facial expressions related to fear and happiness.

Another revealed that shy children had smaller vocabularies than their extroverted classmates. But this doesn't mean all quiet people are condemned to a lonely life filled with anxiety. In fact, a little bit of introversion is not only "OK" — it may be an advantage.

Some studies suggest that one third to one half of Americans are introverts. In fact, all people naturally have a balance of introverted and extroverted tendencies, but we could all take some notes from our shyer selves. In several tests measuring productivity and creativity, people were able to think of more and better ideas when they had time to work privately. Maybe those kindergarten "quiet times" weren't such a bad idea after all.

Extroversion is great, but being quiet and preferring alone time is absolutely OK as well. It can even offer personal and workplace advantages, especially for introverts. Just make sure to share your thoughts with your team!
