The workers of the developed world spent the 20th century watching themselves get replaced by machines. This was as much true for horses as for humans. Despite thousands of years of vital service to everyone from farmers to generals, they were replaced after the introduction of the internal combustion engine and automobiles. In 1898, the world's first conference on urban planning took place in New York City, and every expert in attendance was worried about the "Great Manure Crisis"—millions of pounds of the stuff, every day, produced by the hundreds of thousands of horses that made up the street traffic in the world's great industrial cities. That manure attracted flies, which in turn spread disease; and then there was the other issue of growing and transporting food into cities just to feed so many horses. Like the car, horses caused us problems even as they made our lives easier. Fast-forward to now, and a world where robots can complete jobs for humans. Will history repeat its self? When we invent new machinery, we impact our natural kingdom just as much as we do ourselves.
