A Fact File About Rainforest Animals

Rainforests are very important because they are home to many endangered species. Many animals live in the trees, and each animal has special features to survive in this environment. Two well-known rainforest animals are the sloth and the spider monkey.

The sloth spends most of its life in trees. It has furry limbs and long, strong claws to help it survive there. The sloth can hang upside down from branches for many hours. It moves very slowly and carefully. The sloth is diurnal, which means it is active during the day. Because it moves slowly, it saves energy and stays safe from danger.

The spider monkey also lives high in the trees. Unlike the sloth, it moves very quickly. It has long limbs that help it swing from tree to tree. Swinging allows the spider monkey to travel fast and find food easily. It is also diurnal and spends most of its time in the forest canopy.

Although both animals live in trees and are active during the day, they move in very different ways. Scientists say that many rainforest animals are endangered species because forests are being destroyed. Therefore, protecting the rainforest is very important for their survival.
