In 1887, a British doctor named Arthur Conan Doyle published a crime story called A Study in Scarlet. In the story, a brilliant detective solves a mysterious murder. Since then, that detective has become one of the most popular and best-known characters in literature. His name is Sherlock Holmes.

There are 60 different Sherlock Holmes stories. The most famous is probably The Hound of the Baskervilles. In that story, Holmes has to find out why Sir Charles Baskerville has recently died, and why so many people in the area have seen a ferocious giant dog.

Regular characters appear in all the Sherlock Holmes stories. Holmes' friend and assistant, Dr Watson, is an ordinary man. He isn't as intelligent as Holmes, but he is more caring¹ and emotional. Other characters in the stories are Inspector Lestrade, a police inspector who is never as quick as Holmes, and Moriarty, a criminal genius.

Sherlock Holmes is a successful detective because he is unemotional. He solves crimes with cold logic and intelligence. He also uses forensic science². He finds clues³ at the crime scene⁴ and he makes clever deductions about who has been there and who has committed the crime. Holmes understands tiny⁵ details about the clues. For example, at the start of The Hound of the Baskervilles, Holmes looks at a walking stick⁶ and works out⁷ who has left it in his office, where he lives and what his dog is like!

In recent years, directors have modernised the Sherlock Holmes stories for today's audiences⁸. Robert Downey Junior has played a young version of Holmes in modern films, and there have been two modern television series. People all around the world have enjoyed the British series Sherlock and the American series Elementary. Both series put Conan Doyle's characters into our 21st century world with all its technology. Sherlock is set⁹ in London with male actors but Elementary is set in New York and has a female Dr Watson and Moriarty!
