He says being outdoors gives him enormous vitality and he cannot imagine working indoors.

B. Maya
Maya is a marine biologist who moved to New Zealand three years ago. She spends most of her time studying the coral reefs off the northern coast and identifying the sea creatures that inhabit them. She always wears a wetsuit when she goes scuba-diving, even in summer. Her friends say she is always in the highest of spirits after a day underwater.

C. Daniel
Daniel is an adventure sports instructor who teaches skydiving and bungee jumping. He urges all his students to stay calm and focus on their state of mind before jumping. Lisa always dreamed of exploring the ocean, and last spring she finally got the chance. She travelled to a remote province in the south of the country, where the coastline stretched for miles and the landscape was unlike anything she had ever seen before. The sea there was part of a protected national park, made up of hundreds of small islands covered in thick jungle. Local fishermen told her that rare sea turtles and colourful fish still inhabit the waters around the islands, and that the coral reef nearby was one of the most beautiful in the region.

Lisa prepared carefully before the trip. She took scuba-diving lessons every weekend and steadily improved her skills in the pool. Her instructor always urged her to stay calm underwater and focus on her state of mind rather than her fear. On the morning of her first real dive, she put on her wetsuit and made sure the first-aid kit was nearby just in case.

Beneath the surface, the world was completely silent. She could identify dozens of species she only ever saw in books. The colours were so vivid that she felt as though she was swimming inside a painting. When she finally came back up and climbed onto the boat, she was in the highest of spirits and could not stop laughing with joy.
