However, modern soccer began to take shape in England during the Middle Ages. At first, it was a rough game with few rules, often played between whole villages. The game could be violent and was sometimes banned.

In the 19th century, English schools started to play soccer, and the rules became more organized. In 1863, the Football Association was formed in England, creating the first official rules of the game.

From there, soccer spread around the world. As more countries began to play, international matches became popular. In 1904, FIFA was founded to oversee international competitions.
