Wild animals around the world are facing a serious problem: they are losing their homes. Forests are cut down, rivers are polluted, and grasslands are turned into farms and cities. As humans expand their activities, animals have fewer and fewer places to live. This is causing many species to disappear at an alarming rate.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

The main reasons for habitat loss are clear. People need land to build houses, grow food, and create roads. Companies cut down trees to sell wood and make space for factories. Climate change also plays a role, making some areas too hot or too dry for animals to survive. When animals lose their natural homes, they cannot find enough food or safe places to raise their young.

The effects are devastating. Many animal species are now endangered or extinct. For example, orangutans in Southeast Asia are losing their forest homes to palm oil plantations. Polar bears struggle to find food as Arctic ice melts. Even common animals like birds and insects are declining in numbers because their habitats are destroyed.

Some people argue that human development is more important than protecting animal homes. However, scientists warn that losing wildlife will ultimately harm humans too. Animals play crucial roles in nature - they pollinate plants, control pests, and maintain healthy ecosystems. Without them, our own survival becomes difficult. We must find ways to develop our world while protecting the homes of other creatures who share this planet with us.

[Adapted from World Wildlife Fund Global Habitat Loss Report]
