Part 1:

In recent years, volunteering has become an important part of students' lives. Many young people spend their free time taking part in community activities such as cleaning streets, planting trees, and helping elderly people. Some students even travel to rural areas to support children with their studies.

In addition, young people often organize charity events to raise money for people in need. These activities not only bring benefits to the community but also help them develop important life skills. Through volunteering, they learn how to work in teams, communicate effectively, and solve problems.

As a result, many students feel more confident and responsible.
