Healthy or Just Busy?

Open any social media app today and you will find hundreds of posts about healthy living. People share their morning runs, their green smoothies, and their carefully planned meals. For many teenagers and young adults, being healthy has become something to perform as much as something to practise. On one hand, this trend has real benefits. More young people are aware of what they eat, how much they sleep, and why exercise matters. Public interest in health has never been higher, and that is genuinely good news.

On the other hand, the pressure to live "perfectly" can itself become a source of stress. Researchers have found that young people who constantly compare their habits and bodies to what they see online are more likely to feel anxious and inadequate. A student who skips one meal or misses a week of exercise may feel like a failure, even when their overall lifestyle is reasonable and balanced. When the goal shifts from feeling well to looking well, something important gets lost along the way.

True healthy living is quieter than most social media would suggest. It is sleeping enough, moving your body in ways you enjoy, eating meals that nourish you, and spending time with people who make you feel good. It also means being compassionate toward yourself on the days when none of that goes perfectly. A healthy life is not a performance. It is simply a way of paying attention, day by day, to what your body and mind actually need.

Question 31: Which of the following is NOT mentioned as part of the online healthy-living trend?

- A. People post about drinks they believe are healthy
- B. Users share pictures of their exercise routines
- C. Some meals are planned carefully and posted online
- D. Teenagers often post full medical results each month

Question 34: According to the second paragraph, what is the primary risk of comparing oneself to online health trends?

- A. It encourages young people to skip their meals and stop exercising entirely.
- B. It transforms a healthy lifestyle into a psychological burden for the youth.
- C. It makes students believe that a balanced lifestyle is impossible to achieve.
- D. It leads to a complete loss of interest in looking well among social media users.

Question 35: Why does the writer mention a student who misses a meal or a week of exercise?

- A. To show that small changes can feel bigger online than they are
- B. To prove that healthy habits are impossible for busy students
- C. To explain how social pressure can turn normal setbacks into self-doubt
- D. To suggest that strict routines are needed for real success
