Last week, our class had an interesting discussion about how news reaches people in the modern world. Our teacher began by asking us how we usually find out about current events. Most students said they use social media, while a few said they prefer listening to a(n) (1) _____ on the radio during breakfast. She then explained that information can spread in many ways — through newspapers, television, or simply by (2) _____, which has been common long before the internet existed.

However, our teacher also warned us that not all information is reliable. She pointed out that some governments choose to (3) _____ certain content before it reaches the public, which means people do not always get the full story. She also mentioned that people who (4) _____ reading a variety of sources tend to make better judgements about what is true and what is not.

At the end of the lesson, she reminded us that it is easy to (5) _____ rumours or misleading stories online without realising it. In brief, her message was simple: think before you click.

Lan: Too much information or too little, both cause the same problem. Nobody knows what to believe.
Minh: The two situations are completely (6) _____ apart but somehow lead to the same place.
Lan: Best we can do is stick to reliable sources and think before sharing anything.
Minh: Simple advice, but most people ignore it.
Lan: And that's exactly why false stories never stop spreading.

V. Read the text and decide if the statements are TRUE or FALSE.

Getting news today is very different from the past. Decades ago, most people relied on word of mouth or newspapers to find out what was happening in the world. A radio presenter would read the news aloud, and families would gather around to listen together. Advertisements, or adverts, helped pay for these programmes to continue running.

Today, information can circulate within seconds through social media. However, not all of it is accurate. Some governments censor certain stories before they are issued to the public, meaning citizens do not always receive the full truth. Young people especially benefit from learning how to identify reliable sources, as being distracted by false headlines can be harmful. In brief, good media habits are an essential skill in the modern world.

Statements:

1. In the past, radio presenters played no role in delivering news to the public. _____
2. Adverts helped to fund radio news programmes. _____
3. According to the text, information circulates more slowly today than in the past. _____
