FOOD CULTURE SHOCK

Food customs can vary greatly around the world, and adjusting to them can be surprising. Charles thought eating with his fingers in the US was simple, like burgers. However, when he visited South India, he had to learn to mix rice and curry with his fingers to form a "ball". His first attempts were messy, but he eventually understood the technique.

Alfredo finds "fast food" culture shocking. In his home country, food is always cooked fresh and enjoyed together as a family, often at least once a day. To him, food is an important part of a person's identity. While traveling, he was astonished to see people eating junk food on a daily basis. The most shocking thing he witnessed was a baby being given fizzy soda in a bottle, which he found deeply unsettling.

Qiang Shi enjoys exploring the culture and habits surrounding food and eating. In China, declining an offer by saying "No, thanks" is considered polite because it is customary for the offer to be repeated. However, he realized this could be misunderstood abroad, where declining often means the end of the offer. He shared that refusing food in such situations sometimes meant missing out entirely, which was confusing for him at first.

Pauline, a vegetarian, finds it difficult to travel where vegetarian options are limited. In some places, meat is tied to prosperity, and meals without meat are rare.

Aileen struggles with breakfast customs. In Australia, breakfast foods like cereal or fruit are specific, but in Asia, breakfast includes dinner items like noodles and curry, which she finds challenging.
