Australia is testing new age-checking technology to stop people under 16 from using social media platforms like Instagram, TikTok, and Snapchat. The trial, which involves 1,200 participants, will run from January to March 2025. By late 2025, platforms must show they are taking steps to block underage users or face large fines of up to $32 million.

The trial will test three methods of age-checking. The first method uses biometric analysis, where a selfie is scanned to estimate a person's age. The second method involves checking identification documents, such as a passport or ID card, without storing personal data. The third method cross-checks a user's email address with other accounts.

Experts say these systems can help protect young users, but some people are concerned about privacy. Critics worry that uploading personal information could lead to data misuse. The Australian government has promised that social media companies will need to find alternatives to sharing ID documents.

Despite these efforts, there are challenges. Many teenagers do not have official ID documents, and current technology is not 100% accurate. However, the results of this trial may influence how other countries handle age restrictions for social media. If successful, it could set an example for improving online safety for teenagers worldwide.
