

Plastic pollution has become a serious global problem, and I strongly agree that governments should introduce stronger laws to reduce the use of single-use plastics.

Admittedly, some people argue that stricter regulations may cause inconvenience in daily life by limiting access to cheap and convenient plastic products.

However, such short-term inconvenience is outweighed by the long-term environmental and public health benefits of reducing plastic waste.

Governments, moreover, are uniquely positioned to bring about large-scale behavioural change because they have the authority to introduce and enforce legislation.

Measures such as banning unnecessary single-use plastic products, imposing taxes on plastic packaging, and requiring businesses to adopt sustainable alternatives can substantially reduce plastic waste.

These policies not only protect the environment but also encourage innovation in the development of reusable and biodegradable materials.

Therefore, stronger government intervention is essential to curb plastic pollution and create a cleaner, more sustainable future.
