Writers

I'm Mike Darvy, a journalist, and in my articles I discuss how difficult it is to write. Last week, a foreign colleague suggested that I write a document describing the daily activities different writers follow. It immediately made me think about my own routine and Ana Fitzgerald's, a singer famous for writing songs, whose routine was quite different from mine.

Ana's days began at 4 am, weekdays and weekends. Her alarm clock had a loud ring so she could hear it. She spent half the day playing jazz and taking short notes. At 1 pm., after lunchtime, she wrote lots of lines for her songs until 6 pm. Then, she exercised for about two hours while singing her new songs. Her days always ended with a healthy dinner, and she went to bed at 10 pm.

My days are quite different. I don't have a daily plan and I don't use alarms. I usually wake up and see if I have any events for the day. If I'm free, I read the latest news on my cell phone. During the day I just let things happen. Every Friday I visit my cousins; their opinions are quite useful. In the evenings, I go for a walk, which helps me find information that I use in my writings. Then, I write for several hours after midnight. On Sundays, I spend time with my girlfriend at home.

Why I quit social media

In recent years, there has been plenty of research about social media. Some studies prove it could be mentally unhealthy and suggest taking a break from it. I decided to quit Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram and see for myself what benefits it could bring.

Now that I no longer have access to those networks, I get more work done and have time to do extra chores like answering more e-mails and talking to people who I can do business with. I might not get as many invitations nowadays, but the ones I get now are completely genuine. So, it's been positive.

As for my "friends", I have no idea what they all are doing, but those who really care about me are still there. I get involved with them on a real level, face to face. I listen to them without checking Facebook on my cell phone at the same time.

I do things and enjoy them without wondering how they will look on Instagram. When I went out to eat with friends or relatives, I'd always pause to upload pictures of the food. I'd also publish online our location every time we went to whatever club or department store we visited. Now, I'm living my life for my own pleasure, not for social media.

I depended too much on social networks. My media was constantly full of videos and photos showing my day-to-day life. It was an awful habit—some kind of disease. Today, I feel free. I am enjoying something unexpected, which I had no idea I had lost.

120. What is the writer doing in this article?

- A. the benefits that leaving social media provides.
- B. how to avoid using your e-mail account all the time.
- C. that people depend too much on the Internet.
- D. which types of people are more likely to use social media.

122. After quitting social media, the writer

- A. has been working more.
- B. still receives many invitations.
- C. has more friends in his social networks.
- D. is learning more about his business.

123. With the sentence in paragraph four "I'm living my life for my own pleasure, not for social media", the author means that he

- A. enjoys checking other people's posts on social media.
- B. is willing to publish photos of the food he eats online.
- C. is worried about sharing his location on social media.
- D. cares about himself rather than others' opinions online.

124. Which of these sentences would the writer most likely say?

- A.  Used social networks more, daily
- B.  You must learn how to have more friends online
- C.  I won't go back to Facebook
- D.  I won't get health issues anymore
