Family Structures and Relationships

Family structures have changed significantly in many societies over the last few decades. In the past, the extended family was the most common type. In this structure, grandparents, parents, aunts, uncles, and children lived together in a single household. This large family provided support and comfort in daily life, but it also led to frequent conflicts due to different viewpoints. Today, nuclear families, consisting of only parents and children, have become more popular. These smaller families give members more privacy and independence, allowing them to pursue their own interests.

Furthermore, relationships within modern families have become more democratic. Parents today are more willing to listen to their children's opinions and give them the freedom to make choices. However, these changes also bring challenges. For instance, the generation gap in nuclear families can sometimes widen when parents and teenagers spend too much time on electronic devices. To maintain strong relationships, family-oriented events are highly recommended. These activities encourage family members to communicate, cooperate, and appreciate one another, helping them overcome conflicts.

25. What is the main idea of the passage?

- A. The benefits of living with grandparents in extended families.
- B. The historical development of hi-tech appliances in housework.
- C. How to resolve generation conflicts using electronic devices.
- D. The transformation of family structures and relationships.

26. The word "it" in the first paragraph refers to _____.

- A. modern society B. extended family C. nuclear family D. household area

27. According to the passage, why are relationships in modern families more democratic?

- A. Grandparents make all decisions in nuclear family groups.
- B. Family members avoid talking to bridge the generation gap.
- C. Children have equal rights to buy hi-tech home appliances.
- D. Parents listen to children and give them freedom of choice.

28. How can families strengthen their relationships according to the text?

- A. By organizing family-oriented events to communicate.
- B. By giving children complete independence in society.
- C. By studying abroad to avoid generation gap conflicts.
- D. By replacing old-fashioned tools with smart devices.
