The Little Birdhouse

One Saturday morning, Max and his sister Emma were walking through a small forest near their village. They wanted to take photos of birds for a school project. As they walked deeper into the forest, Emma stopped suddenly.

"Look!" she said.

A wooden birdhouse was lying on the ground. One side was broken, and two tiny birds were standing on a nearby branch. They were making loud noises.

"I think this is their home," Max said.

Emma looked around. "Maybe the wind blew it down."

Max picked up the birdhouse carefully. "Let's fix it," he said.

The children didn't have any tools with them, so they took the birdhouse home. Their grandfather helped them repair it with some wood and nails. The next day, they returned to the forest. They hung the birdhouse on a strong tree, higher than before. The two little birds flew around it for a few minutes. Then one bird flew inside. Emma smiled.

"We didn't plant a hundred trees," she said. "We only fixed one small home."

"Sometimes helping one animal is a good way to help nature," Grandpa replied.

From that day on, Max and Emma always looked around carefully before leaving the forest. If they found rubbish, they picked it up. If they found something broken, they tried to repair it instead of walking away.
