Michael has always been interested in technology. He started learning how to code when he was ten years old and spent most of his free time creating simple websites and games.

After finishing secondary school, he enrolled in a computer science programme at university. During his studies, he worked part-time for a small software company. Three years ago, he was invited to join a team developing educational apps in Australia.

Although leaving his family behind was not easy, Michael accepted the challenge and moved overseas. At first, he struggled to make new friends and adapt to the different culture. However, things became easier after a few months.

One afternoon, while he was attending a technology conference, he met a woman whose company specialised in online learning. They quickly became friends and later collaborated on several projects designed to help students learn more effectively.

Today, Michael enjoys his work and believes that moving abroad was a great opportunity. In the future, he hopes to create his own educational platform.
