In 2003, Aron Ralston was exploring a remote canyon in the United States when a large rock suddenly fell and trapped his right arm against the canyon wall. He was completely alone and had no way to contact anyone. At first, he believed that someone would eventually find him. However, after several days without food and with very little water left, he realised that waiting was no longer a realistic option.

During the long hours he spent trapped, Aron carefully considered different ways to survive. He tried moving the rock, but it was far too heavy. He also recorded video messages for his family because he thought he might never leave the canyon alive. Despite the situation, he continued looking for solutions and refused to give up.

After more than five days, Aron made an extremely difficult decision. In order to escape, he amputated his own arm using a small tool he was carrying. He then climbed out of the canyon and walked several kilometres before meeting other hikers, who helped him reach safety.

Later, Aron said that the experience completely changed his perspective on life. Although he faced a terrible situation, he became known around the world for his determination and resilience.
