

1 Read the text carefully.

Today, I have an appointment with Dr Adnan Maqdsi, Director of the Jericho Farm Research Centre. I'm going to interview him about their work.

There, Dr Maqdsi welcomes me and immediately says, "First, I'm going to show you round. Let's go." I can see this growing area is a big, modern place.

Soon, we're in a large science lab and I see scientists in white coats hard at work. Then, we pass through a warehouse and I notice various farm products – onions, tomatoes, bananas, figs, lemons, oranges, beans and carrots. Next, we visit the fields. Let's stop and I'll show you something," he suddenly says. "We're experimenting with different kinds of tomato plants. We're developing new kinds that will grow well in hot, dry conditions. When we pick them, we're going to test them in different ways. We're going to weigh them and check for quality and also for diseases."

Later, in his office, I ask Dr Maqdsi why they are doing all this. He points to a human population chart on the wall. "Look," he says, "in 1900, there were 1.5 billion people, but then the world went mad. Now there are over seven billion and by 2050 we predict that there'll be over nine – nine billion mouths to feed every day."

"And," he goes on, "that's why we're growing more crops, using new methods and finding ways to reduce waste. We hope by the end of the century we'll have to produce more food with less good farmland."

New varieties, new crops and new methods will help to increase food production. Dr Maqdsi believes that farmers, researchers and consumers can all work together for a healthier and more sustainable future.

Less land
