

Successful global marketing strategy by McDonald's

McDonald's increasing success over the past decades was because of the company's ability to understand their diverse target audiences.

- Not only do they show understanding and support for cultural diversity, they make sure to understand the country's preferences and values. For instance, in China, their rapid urbanization has raised many concerns for the environment and public health because of the water scarcity¹ and pollution. As a result, McDonald's advertisements in China were more focused on displaying fresh, clean ingredients. Another example is India where 85% of the population cannot eat beef because of their Hindu religion. As a result, McDonald's tailors to this culture by not selling any beef products in their stores but chicken and fish products instead. Moreover, in France, McDonald's released a campaign called "Venez Comme Vous Etes" which translates to "Come As You Are" to support the tolerance of the gay community. The intention of this ad was to show that McDonald's is a place where people can be themselves. This campaign was released back in 2010, when the LGBTQ² community was more accepted in France than it was in America. I think this campaign is a great example of McDonald's humanizing their brand by understanding the cultural differences.
- Their strong support for cultural diversity and ability to successfully see what sets every country apart has a tremendous effect on their sales worldwide. Even with these changes, they are able to keep a consistent branding so that it can be recognized worldwide.
