Parody of Don Quixote and the Windmills

Señor Quexada was a gentleman who lived in El Paso, Texas. Señor Quexada dreamed of living like the stories he read, where brave knights rescued fair ladies from danger.

To live his dream, Señor Quexada changed his name to Don Quixote, the name a renowned knight would have. Then he set off on a quest to win the admiration of the pretty girl who worked at the local farmer's market, Aldonza Lorenzo.

Arriving at the market, Don Quixote was very alarmed to see Aldonza, whom he dubbed "Dulcinea," using a stick to fight off dozens of slithering snakes.

"I'll save you, my fair lady!" Don Quixote bellowed, and he grabbed the stick from Dulcinea.

"What are you doing?" Dulcinea cried, confused.

Then Don Quixote looked down and realized he was holding a string kitchen mop with a wooden handle—there were no snakes, after all!
