TEXTUAL COHERENCE (Reading)

Read the text. Then write in the lines the abstracts missing from the square below the corresponding letter.

1. When Abraham Maslow published his Hierarchy of Needs in 1943, it had an almost immediate impact on a wide variety of fields, including sociology, psychology, education, business studies, and human resource management. But recently, researchers have been applying the paradigm to a field outside the human/social realms: that of zoo management.

2. Tigers are some of the most popular animals in zoos around the world. In fact, it has recently been estimated that there are more tigers in captivity than in the wild: around 5,000 tigers are kept in zoos in the United States alone, while it is estimated that there are only around 3,200 wild tigers left in the world. _____ So, Dr. Michael Hudson has been using Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs to try to make this task easier for zoos and to make the lives of tigers in zoos more pleasant.
3. The first and bottom layer of the hierarchy focuses on physiological needs. As they are for humans, for tigers these needs are largely associated with a steady food supply. In the wild, this is uncertain. Prey might be hard to find or difficult to catch, and the tiger may be old or ill. In captivity, giving tiger's plentiful sustenance meets this basic need. Unlike humans, however, another basic physiological need is exercise. More than any other animal, the tiger has a huge territorial range: tigers like to prowl around in areas that often exceed 60 square miles (155 sq km). Naturally, when they are shut up in cages that measure less than five square feet (0.46 sq km), they suffer greatly, become depressed and die earlier than they would have in the wild. Tigers need to move a lot every day. _____ where the tiger can move around as much as possible.
4. Next in the hierarchy comes safety, another basic requirement of tigers, which they meet in various ways. _____ When they are in danger – for example when that territory is encroached upon by other animals, including other tigers – they look for cover or a place to hide within their demarcated area. Zookeepers have used this knowledge to allow tigers to establish their own hiding place within the wider enclosure.
5. After safety come the love and belonging needs, and at first glance, these might appear to be specifically human needs. But tigers clearly have these needs, too. Tigers' mating rituals include behavior that can only be called flirting. Tigers also like to make friends: in the wild, they have been observed playing with other tigers and, like all other mammals, they clearly establish relationships, especially mother–offspring relationships. Zookeepers have also noticed that tigers who have no contact with other tigers, or indeed no contact with humans, soon display signs of grief and go into a terminal decline. This is why tigers are kept in large enclosures with other tigers, rather than ...

- a) Researchers at the Department of Zoo Management at Colorado State University in the United States have been applying Maslow's ideas to the keeping of tigers.
- b) Meeting this need requires zoos to build large tiger enclosures.
- c) Tigers are difficult animals to keep in captivity.
- d) Safety needs are often felt by the tiger as fear.
- e) Tigers are often regarded as solitary animals.
- f) Tigers establish and mark their territory with urine and by calling out warnings to other tigers in the vicinity.
