A Small Project, A Big Change

Last year, Daniela and her university classmates started an interesting community project in Quito. They wanted to help children from low-income families discover their talents through art, music, and photography.

Daniela was a photography student, and she loved taking pictures. One day, she visited a community center and met some children. They were interested in photography, but they didn't have cameras. Daniela wanted to help them, so she talked to her classmates about the problem.

Her classmates liked the idea. They collected old cameras and repaired them. Some students also brought painting materials because they wanted the children to use them during the workshops. Daniela was very happy because everyone supported her.

A famous Ecuadorian photographer heard about the project. Daniela invited him to visit the community center, and he accepted her invitation. During his visit, he showed the children his photographs. They listened to him carefully because his stories were interesting and inspiring.

At the end of the project, the students organized an art exhibition. They invited parents, teachers, and local artists. Daniela and her classmates prepared the exhibition together. It was a wonderful experience for them.

One little girl, Sofia, presented her favorite photograph. Her mother looked at it and smiled. She told Sofia, "You have a special talent. Never give up on it!"

The project changed everyone's lives. The children learned new skills, and the university students discovered something important: when we help others, we also learn from them. They decided to organize another project next year because they believed in its positive impact.
