-----, more and more people have been attending university and arguments have persisted as to whether students should pay for this privilege or not. ----- there are convincing arguments on both sides, I strongly believe that it should be free.

One argument put forward in favor of charging students is that education is becoming more expensive to fund as universities grow in size. -----, students are asked to pay in order to maintain standards and ensure the quality of the teaching. -----, it is believed that most students benefit from university in terms of higher paid jobs, hence it is considered fair that they pay for at least some of the cost, especially ----- the majority of students attending university are from the middle classes. -----, in many countries, there is a shortage of people doing manual jobs such as plumbing and carpentry, so making university more expensive may encourage people to take up these jobs.

-----, there are a number of arguments against paid university education. -----, it will encourage more people to attend and will benefit society. This is because it will lead to a more productive and educated workforce. Research has generally shown that those countries with better educated population via university have higher levels of innovation and productivity. ----- to this, there is the issue of equality of opportunity. ----- all students are required to pay, those on a low income may be dissuaded from attending, ----- making it unfair. ----- is that they will likely not be able to secure financial support from their family so they will be concerned about the debts they will incur in the future.

-----, I am of the opinion that all education should remain equally available to all ----- of income. ----- is this fair, but it will also ensure that countries can prosper and develop into the future with a well-educated workforce.
