Online Safety

Nowadays, more and more people reconnect on social media. We are delighted to read classmates' comments and catch up on their news. Friends we haven't seen or heard from for years suddenly reappear in our lives. They tag us in photos and posts. The communication continues and grows, with other photos appearing — our first car and job, our place of birth or our current residence. We could share our permanent address with someone.

Important events and dates in our lives are shared in what we, perhaps, view as a private group. We wouldn't give this information to a stranger directly, yet we give it to them indirectly, usually without even realising it. Hackers love personal details such as memorable names or events that we use to access our bank accounts. Alternatively, these dishonest people may steal your identity to do dirty business or make purchases with your credit card. By the time you realise, they may have spent large sums of money in your name.

As well as posts, an apparently funny, innocent quiz or test to find out which famous person or cartoon character you are similar to can give away personal secrets like your favourite car brand, drink or ideal holiday destination, or potentially useful pieces of information that hackers can use. Or maybe not hackers, but you might find yourself feeling irritated by constant publicity and special offers.

Even people who avoid choosing very obvious personal details as their passwords can make the mistake of using the same password for several sites and accounts. If a hacker manages to access your details on one website, then all your accounts can be accessed and are in danger. Sadly, around 30,000 websites are hacked every day.

Security experts suggest that we should regularly change the security questions we are asked by banks and businesses. Never put any important personal details in an email, and think carefully about tagging the date or place where you were in that photo you post online. If a website asks for details like your phone number or date of birth, check carefully why they are asking for this information and what they say they will do with it. You may agree to allow the company to share your information with other businesses. Of course, you should be honest with banks, but this is not the case with sites that ask you to review products or places.

It is also the case when we buy some stuff on social media. When you click the link to an online shop, spend another minute to check if this web page is not newly made. This simple action will prevent you from hackers who can use your data for the wrong reasons. So, these easy things will help us surf the Net safely.

Secret Treasure

Every family seems to have secrets (33)_____. One winter when I was about 8 years old, I found out something that really surprised me. At the time, I was staying with my grandparents in their detached house during my Christmas break. I loved spending time with them, however, I don't think these elderly people were always comfortable being around such an energetic boy, so (34)_____.

I used to love going down to the basement (35)_____ looking through all the old stuff kept there. There were a lot of interesting old things stored in boxes. One day, while I was building a castle from some boxes and books, I came across a chest full of old-fashioned cloaks and 'Who do they all belong to?' I wondered.

For the next few days, I kept thinking about the clothes. I finally told my grandparents (36)_____. Grandad looked up from his newspaper and smiled. 'Well, I can't keep it a secret,' he said. 'When I was young, I liked to show magic tricks and people said that I was good at it. When I was about 17 years old, I fell in love with your grandma. As I decided (37)_____, I needed to leave her and start my career. I was away for two years.' Grandad looked up and said, 'I performed a lot and became very successful, but, surprisingly, I didn't like to be recognised all the time. So (38)_____.' I went over and hugged them, 'That's so sweet!' I said.

A I had to find ways to entertain myself

B to become a well-known magician

C going to Las Vegas

D and our one is not an exception

E what I had found

F where I would spend hours

G I came back and proposed to your grandma

H I knew that they loved me
