Graffiti and the "Broken Windows" Theory of Crime

You have probably heard of Banksy, the world's most famous graffiti artist, but you 1  (never / hear) of police officer Colin Saysell before. However, he is also a big name in the graffiti world – but for very different reasons! When graffiti artists paint on public buildings in Britain, Saysell is the person who 2  (catch) them and take them to court. Fortunately, he and his team 3  (use) modern technology like software to track cars as they hunt graffiti artists across the country. They 4  (upset) quite a lot of graffiti artists over the years because Saysell's name is now often painted on buildings too – as a protest against his police work!

Nevertheless, Saysell has no regrets. He follows the "broken windows" theory of crime, which says that stopping small crimes like graffiti and breaking windows 5  (prevent) bigger crimes in the future.

Other people criticise this approach. They say we 6  (encourage) graffiti as a form of artistic freedom. In contrast, Saysell says he doesn't mind graffiti itself – just the graffiti that is on other people's property. So while he is on the case, any people thinking of doing illegal painting 7  (leave) their spray cans at home!
