My prisoner, my friend, my president and my father

In 1978, Christo Brand was an 18-year-old white South African boy. He became a warden in the famous prison on Robben Island. This is where the biggest criminals in South Africa were imprisoned, including political prisoners. Brand didn't know much about politics.

And then he met prisoner 46664, a quiet 60-year-old black man. He started to talk to Brand and ask him questions - questions about his family, his education, his plans for the future. Prisoner 46664 was Nelson Mandela, who would one day become the first black president of South Africa. "There was no colour barrier between us," said Brand. "Like me, Mandela came from a farm. We understood that we shared the same sky and the same air."

The two men became friends. But their friendship had to be secret and their conversations had to be short. Brand considered Mandela a warm and thoughtful person.

Mandela was a generous man, and he never forgot his friend. When he became president, he got Brand a job. One day, Brand was putting documents on the table when Mandela came in. He saw Brand, went to him and hugged him. Mandela looked at all the important people in the room and said: "This person was my warden and my friend." Brand says that he felt very proud at that moment.

Nelson Mandela died in December 2013, aged 95. Like so many people around the world, Brand was very sad. He said at the time, "Mandela was my prisoner, my friend, my president and my father."
