

Learning the art of good composition and written expressionyears of practice. Adults can guide you along the long roadeffective writing, but you and your brain have to do the hard work, through regular trial and error, mistakes,corrections, trying again and, and learning to turn the thoughts in your mind into words paper. The earlier you start this long, difficult process the better, preferably by the age of eight. If you find you are in secondary school, andhaven't had much practice in essay writing, don't despair. you try to write least one or two short essays a week, your brain will soon start making new verbal connections, and you will notice that words will begin to come easily to you. Even short writing tasks, as the sentence and paragraph exercises shown on the next page, can make an enormous improvement to your writing if they are done regularly. A small amount of daily writing practice is more beneficial than an enormous essay written only once per term. If possible, try to have your work corrected thoroughly a person who can write well, so that you are made aware all your errors in grammar, spelling, punctuation, essay layout and essay content. By noting your mistakes and trying not to repeat them, your writing will slowly improve. If there is no-one to check your work, don't worry. By regular writing practice, your brain will given the important exercise it needs to help you improve your writing style. You will still become a better writer..... without someone to guide you, although maybe not quite as quickly.

I will provide you lessons on the various essays, letters and reports you might be asked to write in EBAU, B2 or C1, and in the job world. I will also give you several examples of model essays to show you what to aim for, as as plenty of topics to try for yourself.
