Hi Craig, How's it going? Are you still enjoying work? I found uni difficult at first but it's OK now. At school the teachers (1) were telling/would tell us when to do assignments, but now I have to organise my own study time and there are so many things to fit in. Remember how we (2) used/would to prepare all our assignments in class first? Now I have to arrange to see my tutor if I need help. And back at school I (3) wouldn't to do/didn't use to do much work until just before the exams but now, with continuous assessment, I have to stay on top of everything. I got good marks for my last assignment though, which I'm pleased about because, as you know, I (4) would be/used to be quite lazy but on this assignment I worked very hard. I'll be home soon. I've got a holiday job at the same place I (5) was working/had been working last year. It will be nice to have some money! Hope to see you then,

Anna

Technology in the classroom

Technology plays a large part in the lives of most students today. (1) Handwritten essays are also becoming a thing of the past. Many schools equip their classrooms with computers for use during lessons, and students are expected to be computer literate at an early age. (2) Therefore, school libraries are no longer as necessary as they once were. The world of learning is changing quickly and dramatically. But how far can technology go in education? Will teachers still be necessary in 10 or 20 years' time? Or will online teaching be the norm? Now, there's a thought! In Denmark, the government is taking the use of computers in schools one step further. Computers are now being used in the exam room itself. (3) Using computers in exams is not completely new for Danish students. They have been able to type up their exam essays on computers instead of writing them by hand for several years. However, now, under a new scheme, students in exams are allowed complete access to the Internet. (4) The only thing they cannot do is communicate with anyone else online. So, no emailing or messaging while in the exam room. Opponents of the idea point out that it is very difficult to ensure that all the computers are working at the same speed – or even working at all, which can only add to the stress for exam students. Then there are security concerns, with some people suggesting that using computers like this in exams opens the door to cheating. They say it is impossible to monitor the sites the students visit or any contact they may make with friends outside the exam room or even other students in the same exam. (5) They point out that exams these days are no longer about remembering facts and figures. They are about analysing things. Examination questions these days do not usually ask about when, who or what. They ask why and how. It's hard to cheat using the Internet on questions like this. Surely, computers are such an important part of the learning process today that it is a natural step to use them in exams? Many people believe that it is only right that students should be tested with the same tools that they use to learn. For those worried about cheating, it's important to remember that in exams the students are under a lot of pressure and have to do a lot of things in a very short time. (6) Perhaps computer use in exams will become standard procedure in a few years' time. What do you think? We'd love to hear your views. Post a comment on our website
