Breaking down barriers through music

In 1999, a group of musicians got together in Weimar, Germany, for what was originally planned to be a one-off workshop. It had been organised by the Argentinian-Israeli pianist and conductor Daniel Barenboim, and his great friend the Palestinian-American academic and writer Edward Said. The aim of the event was to bring together musicians from two countries – Israel and Palestine – which had been in conflict for many years. <sup>1</sup> ____ Over two decades later, it is thriving as the West-Eastern Divan Orchestra.

The legendary orchestra is named after a collection of poems by the German poet Goethe about the relationship between western and eastern cultures. <sup>2</sup> ____ It expanded into a full-sized orchestra because there were so many applicants – over two hundred. Since 2002, the orchestra has had a permanent home in Seville, Spain. Christian, Jewish and Muslim religions have existed peacefully alongside each other for several hundred years in this part of the country, so this seems particularly appropriate.

Every summer, the orchestra holds a summer school for several weeks in southern Spain. When this intense period of rehearsal is finished, it goes on an international tour. This is usually focussed around the Middle East region. <sup>3</sup> ____ It also includes a few musicians from Spain, too, as its home in Seville was funded by a Spanish local government and a private foundation.

When musicians start playing with the orchestra, they have to learn to live and work together as equals. Sometimes, this is the first time they have ever met someone from the other country. <sup>4</sup> ____ They often discuss their political ideas during rehearsals. <sup>5</sup> ____ In fact, it's just as important that they feel able to disagree but still work together. In 2016, the orchestra was designated as a United Nations Global Advocate for Cultural Understanding. This recognised its work towards peace and commitment to imagining a better future.

- A It's essential that they get to know each other and understand each other's thoughts and feelings.
- B At first, not many musicians were interested in joining the orchestra.
- C It was intended to overcome ignorance and promote understanding between them.
- D They don't have to agree with each other.
- E The original workshop marked the 250th anniversary of his birth.
- F Although the majority of the orchestra comes from Israel and Palestine, it includes some players from Iran – another country which has a history of conflict with Israel.
