The braille alphabet was invented by a French man named Louis Braille. When he was three, he injured an eye while playing with his father's tools. An infection spread and left him blind in both eyes. But Braille was an excellent student and he won a scholarship to a special school, the National Institute for Blind Youth in Paris. One of the teachers there invited an army captain named Barbier to come teach a new reading system that had been created for Napoleon's soldiers. It was designed so that soldiers could read secretly at night without light, but it was too complicated for the army and they didn't want it. Unfortunately, it was difficult for the blind students as well. But the young Braille started experimenting to create a simpler system. In 1824, when Braille was only fifteen, he found a way to make it easier to feel the patterns of raised dots, which was much quicker to read. Later, Braille became a teacher himself and taught his code of 63 characters to his students, who then went on to spread the knowledge and make it popular around the world.

Hi, readers! I just returned from Nigeria! I worked at an education centre for children from poor areas. Since I'm good with computers, I helped children at the centre learn basic ICT skills. Most of them had never seen a computer before!

I met some really nice volunteers at the centre. We went on a safari together at the end of the summer and it was a lot of fun!

I found out about the centre when I was surfing the Net. If you're interested in volunteering, you can find out information on their website educent.com. Have you ever volunteered overseas? Tell me about it in the comments!
