Teenage Fashions, by Lucy Watts

Do you know the clothes that your grandparents wore when they were your age? I found out that until the 1940s, young people had dressed like their parents so there were no fashions specially for teenagers then. That's really hard to imagine now, isn't it?

A couple of days ago I was looking at some family photos and talking about them with my grandma. As a result of what I saw, I decided to look further into the history of fashions for young people.

I discovered that in the late 40s and 50s, big changes started to happen. For example, people began to have a little more money to spend. Also, man-made materials like nylon were becoming really popular. So materials that people had worn until then, like wool and silk, soon stopped being fashionable.

Another change was that teenagers going to college in the 50s began to wear casual sweaters and trousers, or tight skirts.
