Satellite television

When my parents decided that to get a new satellite television, I asked them why they thought this was a good idea. I doubted it whether it was really necessary, and told to them that I had thought they spent too much time watching television. They agreed they didn't go out very much, but were insisted that they had had thought about the matter very carefully. 'We enjoy television,' they said me, 'and when we asked you, you said that you agreed with us.' I replied them that I didn't remember being asked, and that I would have tried to stop them. Then they were admitted that they had asked me while I was watching my favourite programme. I asked them what was I had been watching, and they said it was a football match. 'You told us that to keep quiet, so we thought that you agreed!'
