Adapting in Australia

Austin and Kyle had just arrived in Darwin on Australia's northern coast. They were excited about visiting Kakadu National Park, but the flight from the United States had taken twenty hours, and they were tired.

Austin's stomach emitted a loud growl. He suggested finding something to eat. Near the harbor, Austin noticed a small shop that had a sign for pies.

"What kind of pie do you have?" asked Austin.

The clerk said, "Let's see, we have potato and sausage, or steak and onion."

Austin blinked. Kyle gulped. "Do you have blueberry?" asked Austin slowly, with hesitation.

The man laughed. "Sorry mate, all we sell here are meat pies."

Kyle ordered one of each as Austin looked at him questioningly. Kyle told him they might as well try them. As they devoured their food, which was tasty, they walked beside the harbor. They saw a sign with a diagram of a swimmer with a line through it, indicating that swimming was not allowed in the bay. They remembered that this area was home to the box jellyfish, or stinger. While many of the creatures are only the size of a grapefruit, their sting has been known to cause death.

Suddenly, they heard an eerie wail. Then there were barking and chirping sounds, followed by a long buzzing drone. Austin and Kyle hurried toward the noise.

They came to a shop with its door open. A man was standing inside, blowing into a long, stylish, wooden tube. This was the source of the strange and wonderful sounds.

The man said that the musical instrument was a didgeridoo. He explained that the instruments are usually made from tree parts that have been hollowed out by termites. The shopkeeper played another song for them, until Austin yawned and Kyle struggled to keep his eyes open. They said good night to their new friend and walked back to their room for some much-needed sleep.

The next morning, they rode to Kakadu National Park, Australia's largest national park. A park ranger welcomed them.

He said, "We have quite a few of what we call 'tropical nasties' here at Kakadu. You don't want to miss the salty, also known as the saltwater crocodile, on your tour of the park. These reptiles can grow up to twenty feet in length, and they have been known to include humans in their diet. They're found in both salt and fresh water, so we don't recommend swimming here. There are other places where you can swim, though."

Kyle leaned over and whispered to Austin, "That's OK. My head is already swimming with all the new things I've seen and done in Australia."
