The first people who enjoyed chocolate were the Mayan and Aztec in Central and South America hundreds of years ago. In those days, the people did not really eat chocolate; they used the cocoa bean to make a chocolate drink they liked very much. Much later, they took the cocoa bean to Europe, and people there also loved the taste of chocolate. In 1824, John Cadbury opened a small shop in Birmingham. One of the products he sold was cocoa powder to make drinks. In 1831, he opened a small factory. John Cadbury believed that alcohol was an important cause of poverty in England and he wanted people to drink chocolate instead. A few years later a man called Joseph Fry invented a way to make chocolate bars, and so for the first time people had the chance to eat chocolate instead of only drinking it. At first, chocolate was a luxury and only the rich people could buy it. Later, when they produced more and more chocolate bars, it became cheaper.

1. The article is about the origins of chocolate
2. Mayan and Aztec people ate and drank the chocolate
3. John Cadbury wanted people to drink alcohol
4. People started to eat chocolate after John Cadbury opened his factory
5. At the beginning, chocolate bars were very expensive
