There are many ways of putting a 3D object into 2D. Orthographic projections can be found on all construction projects. These drawings show different views of the object, and can include elevations (a view from one side) and cross-sections (the view when you cut through an object). Another type of drawing shows exploded views, which are very useful for understanding the assembly of an object, in other words how it all fits together. A third type of drawing is the plan view, which allows us to see an object from above. A typical example of this is a floor plan. These are very useful when we want to look at the fittings in detail, in other words where objects like cookers and baths go.
