Dan Stuart lives in a block of flats in the city. He does not have friends at school, he does not do sports and he does not play outdoors. After school and at weekends, he plays computer games and watches TV for many hours. His mother is angry; he rarely does his chores and he never plays with boys of his age. Dan's mother has read that children who live in cities do not get as much exercise as they should. They rarely do anything active. Many kids in cities do not go to PE classes or do not do any exercise during the breaks.

Dan's mother knows how to make her son more active. He telephones her cousin Maria who lives in the country. She asks Maria if she and Dan can stay with them in the summer. Her cousin thinks it is a good idea. She has a large family. All the family members live an active life. Her husband is a tractor driver and her four children walk two miles to school. They all have chores to do and they help each other. They also play many games together and have a lot of fun.
