Schools are different. Last summer I was at the camp and there was a boy from Mexico. His name is Rami. He told me about his school. It usually starts at half past seven in the morning. But Rami goes to school at a quarter to seven because he wants to take a desk in the front. There are fifty-two students in his class.

The students play in the playground before classes. Some of them wear a school uniform: a white shirt and blue trousers for boys or a white blouse and a blue skirt for girls. Other students wear just jeans and T-shirts.

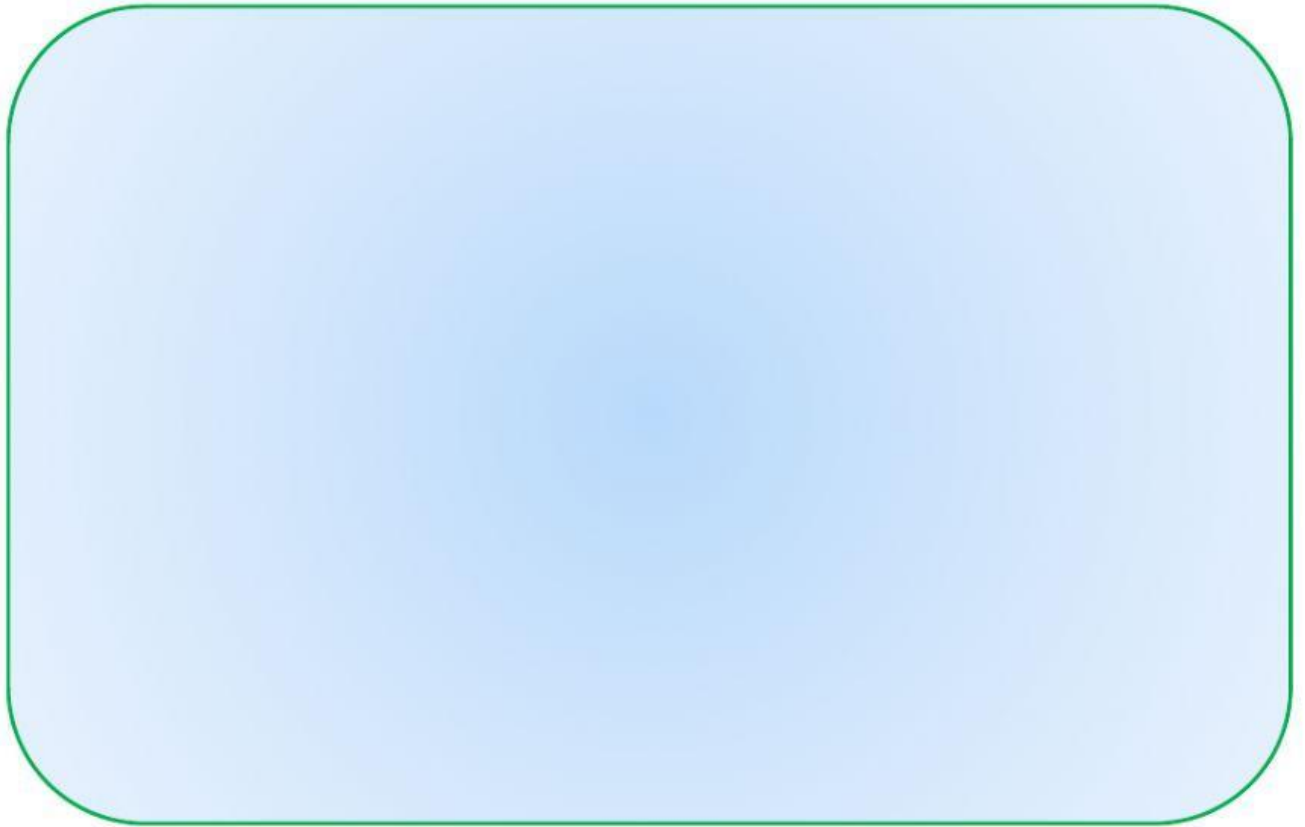

Before lessons begin they usually sing one or two songs. Then they have a Maths lesson. Not all the children have books. There is usually one book for two or three students. The teacher writes the questions on the blackboard, and the children write them down into their copybooks.

After classes Rami plays football with his friends and then he goes home.
